Aerobic composting is widely used for manure composting in China and involves repeated wet and dry cycles. However, the bacterial community dynamics in the process are still unclear. In this study, the bacterial community dynamics were investigated using conventional and terminal-restriction fragment length polymorphism (T-RFLP) methods under alternating wet and dry cycles. It was found that the bacterial community structures changed dramatically. Dominant bacteria during the wet period were Aeromonas sp., Haemophilus paragallinarum, Moraxella sp. and Proteus sp.; those during the dry period were Burkholderia sp. and Sphingobacterium sp. However, the bacterial community structure under both wet and dry conditions was different, which was also found by the T-RFLP results. These results indicate
